Few jobs are more gut-wrenching than investigating crimes involving the sexual exploitation of children. The desire to protect and fight for children emboldened Kevin J. Laws to fight to protect the most vulnerable in society. Laws was a special agent with Homeland Security Investigations, investigating child sex crimes for nearly twenty years, a decade of which were spent as an undercover agent. While his work online resulted in the conviction of over sixty criminals, Laws continues to educate law enforcement and civilians on his career findings, and his new memoir shines a spotlight on the underbelly of society.

In “Hunter of the Damned,” Laws recounts his days working as an undercover agent in Internet chat rooms and recounts his email exchanges and chat sessions with predators, uncovering horror after horror. Offering a rare look into the investigatory process of child sexual exploitation cases, Laws seeks to combat the pervasiveness of child sexual exploitation by raising awareness and by providing a valuable resource for fellow investigators. “While exposing the heinous nature of child sex crimes, I hope to educate readers on predatory behaviors and provide insight on the perpetrators of child sex crimes, particularly for those who are investigating these types of crimes,” Laws said.

About the Author

Kevin J. Laws is a former special agent with Homeland Security Investigations (HSI). He was the HSI subject matter expert on online undercover investigations involving the sexual exploitation of children, and his work has led to the conviction of over sixty perpetrators, saving countless children from sexual exploitation. During his many years investigating Internet crimes against children, he has logged thousands of hours talking with child predators and has authored and served more than 120 search warrants pertaining to child sexual exploitation. He has taught online undercover investigations to hundreds of HSI agents as well as state and local investigators and has held classes in seven countries teaching law enforcement how to investigate and convict perpetrators of child sex crimes. Now retired, he works as an expert witness, providing support to survivors in civil proceedings. He also continues to lecture about the sexual exploitation of children and his experience while working undercover.
